What US practice management software actually costs

Sixteen platforms, with the price each one publishes on its own site, read on November 2, 2026. No review-site numbers, no estimates and no sales calls. Where a vendor publishes no figure, the cell says so. Reviewed every quarter; next edition due February 2027.

Monthly prices in US dollars, on the billing term each vendor advertises. Two of the sixteen publish no subscription price at all.

The same practice, priced by every vendor

The published subscription at one, two, three, five, thirty and fifty providers, with that vendor's own AI note feature switched on for every provider. Card processing, SMS, claim fees and anything billed per transaction are excluded, because they depend on volume.

Read this honestly. Cliniko and Noterro come out below DrinCloud at every size in this table, Carepatron up to thirty providers and Zanda up to five. DrinCloud comes out below SimplePractice, TherapyNotes, Jane App, Healthie, Practice Better, TheraNest, TheraPlatform and Sessions Health from two providers up, because our price moves in practice size bands instead of per seat, and the gap grows with headcount. We publish the whole table rather than the half that flatters us, because a comparison you cannot check is worth nothing.

About the thirty and fifty provider columns. Only DrinCloud and Cliniko publish a band that reaches that far. For every other vendor the figure is their own published per-seat rate multiplied out. Several would quote a volume discount at that size and none of them publishes what it is, so read those two columns as the published price rather than what a large group would end up paying.

How this index is built

Where the figures come from

Every number is read from the vendor's own public pricing page on the check date printed in the header. Nothing comes from a review site, a reseller, an aggregator or a sales call. The source for each row is printed under the vendor name in the first table.

What a blank means

Where a vendor does not publish a figure, the cell says not published. It never says zero and it is never filled with an estimate. Two of the sixteen publish no subscription price at all, which is itself worth knowing when you are drawing up a shortlist.

What the monthly bill includes, and what it leaves out

It includes the published subscription for that number of providers, plus that vendor's own AI note feature switched on for every provider. It leaves out card processing, SMS credits, claim fees, eligibility checks and anything else billed per transaction, because those depend on how much you use them. Several vendors earn more from those lines than from the subscription, so ask about them before you sign.

Promotions are not prices

Where a vendor advertises an introductory discount, the list price is what appears here, with the promotion noted. The figure that matters to a practice is the one it pays in month seven.

Why we publish the rows where we lose

DrinCloud is in this table like everyone else, and four of the fifteen other platforms come out cheaper than us at every size. Publishing only the comparisons that flatter us would make the whole document worthless, including the parts that do flatter us.

Corrections and reuse

Quote it, screenshot it or cite it, with a link back so your readers can see the check date. If a figure is wrong or has moved, write to us and we will correct it and say when it changed. The next edition is due February 2027.
